FUTURA

TYPEFACE
PROMOTION KIT

Futura (created in Germany 1928), formed the core of Bauhaus ideology i.e. strict geometric forms and lack of any embellishments. Based on the same ideology, this slipcase contains an elegant display and an intensive study of the typeface followed by a thorough exploration of not only its traditional but also of unconventional handling. The Wolfgang Weingart typographic process was used characterized by his painterly application of graphical and typographical elements; the typographic drafts are thus compelling yet lucid, free yet controlled.

DESIGNER IDENTITY COLLECTION ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Nordstrom has excelled always in offering fashion collection customized to every consumer. In this season, the idea revolved around bringing the many facets of a woman to the fore. An interesting layering of sketched emotions with the thought provoking lyrics by 'pet shop boys' has been experimented to capture the mood of the collection. The play of scale in typography and colors make it cleverly sharp yet subtle.

Latin nascere—to be born

Nature refers to what is born and grows organically

Nature alone cannot reveal nor preserve the particular beauty of a particular rose at a chosen moment in time as it is perishable and forgettable.

NATURE

Nature and Culture

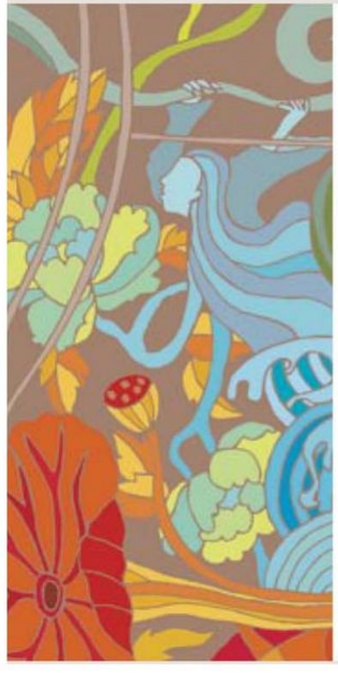

CULTURE

complement each other

Culture refers to what has been grown and groomed

Latin colere—to cultivate

Culture, on the other hand, is not bound by biological time. Culture forces to reveal its essential potentialities and through language, art, music and other cultural means immortalizes nature and brings back to life in the imagination of its members.

Imaginative Nature

In her book Biomimicry, Janine Benyus claims that nature is imaginative by necessity. In nature, for example, a tree growth evolves around cooperative relationships, self-regulating feedback cycles and dense interconnectedness of natural communities. The truth is that in nature, a species cannot occupy a niche that appropriates all resources, there has to be sharing. Any species that ignores this law winds up destroying its community to support its own expansion. The hope is that the new sciences of chaos and complexity tell us that a system that is far from stable is a system ripe for change. Evolution itself is believed to have occurred in fits and starts, plateauing for millions of years and then leaping to a whole new level of creativity after crisis.

The Imagined Culture

There are three layers to culture. The first and second are the social and the historical, which are the sociocultural aspects of culture. The third essential layer to culture is the imagined culture. Discourse communities are characterized not only by facts and artifacts, but by common dreams, fulfilled and unfulfilled imaginings.

A ROOM OF ONE'S OWN

TYPEPLAY WITH CONTEXT AND MEANING

The designer's role is to interpret context to effectively communicate to the audience. My intention was to explore context and meaning through the spatial and typographic articulation of Virginia Woolf's 'A Room Of One's Own'. The aim of the project was to engage the audience with the content through space and type. The physical space and typography were to propel the audience to experience a room of their own. The application was through vinyl letterings on window, with differing viewing experience depending on the day and weather.

DUTCH MONEY

Since stamps and money travel around the world, they've been pin - pointed as worthy of time and effort, and have become national calling cards. The Netherland reissues its 'value paper', the way we issue stamps. Designs are always cycling, with old money still in the circulation and then new money upcoming through. The processes of redesign is endless; it takes about 10 years to work on denomin - ations and then start it over again. This time round, Jaap Drupsteen, the designer; is a self, commissioning of public design in Netherlands is more like a commiss-ioning illustration than hiring another company. This is much different than the outlook toward official public design as practiced in the States.

Graduated multiple - colored litho graphy creates the ten value-bars, then blind embossing gives them a fine, sharp texture like the raised chevrons. A small, a half - obscured fish invites you to move in for a closer examination. It's also an anti counterfeit trap; as the hidden parts are printed on the reverse in a perfect registered fashion. When you hold the bill up to the light, an owl shines through this paper, poised as though it would eat the little fish at the upper left.

Without the fussy, precise detailing, this 'value paper' would lose its authenticity. Without those yellow sprinkles, its pink ribbon shapes, rosettes and its hidden animals, it'd lose its healthy cheerfulness.
The Holographic foils with its own special textures are stamped and embossed deep into the surface of that translucent paper. Shading with light and color gives all these shapes the dimensionality that float above the ground. Bar code is integrated to enhance spatial effect.

The bar shapes are so precise, they seem to represent some specific industry or construction, however the dimensionality is all in fun. The point is that they are always 10. No one would ever try to even read the patterns which is also fine. They are not meant to be read - they are meant only for counterfeit proof as well as they create a delicate texture against which the bolder, simpler shapes stand out. The use of sans serif type gives the design a modern feeling.

It's really no surprise that the new Dutch money is much more beautifully designed than our own. For one thing, the Netherlands has a history of supporting the arts that goes back as far as Rembrandt. It also has long history of commissioning art for commerce. And from then first appearances of advertisements, posters, and packaging. It's been common for painters and fine artists to be hired for the commercial projects. The work has always been viewed as equivalent to fine art - just a different kind of commission. So, the fine and industrial arts are not as deeply divided as they are here, with respect for the other.

DE STIJL

The Dutch government has acknowledged that design is a good tool for communication. Beginning in the 1920's, they instituted an art and design dept. through a PPP (the postal service), the advisory board of which produced postal stamps and other such items that have a wide impact and influence on design for the public sector. As a result, the Dutch have a cultural awareness of design. They even see design as a means for expressing their national integrity, thereby a kind of export product. On the other hand, the U.S. currency has very little to do with aesthetics. It's just meant to symbolize a powerful currency - one that is backed by capitalism, prosperity, democracy and tradition. Dutch currency however on the other hand is artistic, creative and shows design talent.

DUTCH MONEY

AESTHETICS OF VALUE PAPER MAGAZINE ARTICLES

As stamps and money travel around the world, they've been pin-pointed as worthy 'national calling cards'. The Netherlands issues to the design and aesthetics of Dutch Money. The article is a re-interpretation of the critical analysis by the home country as well as by designers around the world. The patterns on the money are well used to create patterns of the article pages. The colors are mellow tones of that on the bills. The type is set in De Stijl style, following the grid and function as to tribute the original Netherland design.

TIEN

Despite the intricate and well counterfeit-proof design of the Dutch money, there has been criticism about Jan Drupsteen's redesign. Inspite of this criticism, it has not made the government withdraw this currency, people seem to like the traditional, 'valuable paper'. They find it a much more beautiful and colorful design. They see the new design as kitschy x trendy. As for people anywhere, their criticism probably reflects their skepticism of this new. In time they'll sure like the design, and hate the upnext the new Euro currency.

1 0 0 0 1 5 4 2 1 0

The paper used for the money itself carries a watermark of a bird, nicely positioned to eat the fish. There's great precision and a certain logic in this whimsy that is what makes the design unique Dutch like.

LOGIC

It reflects their tradition of respect for the arts as well as their talent for arranging things. It's quite a weird mixture: at first glance the note looks like a scientific diagram, at second glance it has no meaning; then, the random patterns resolve into a soft, asymmetrical, flowing composition that has carefully considered structure underneath. The design is completed with a well squentially executed logic.

The genius of the design lies in its contrasts: symmetry against asymmetry; simple shapes against complex detail; rational organization against whimsical imagery, and mechanical forms against those organic forms. Yet with all of this, the design is remarkably consistent from bill to bill. There's a positional grid underlying both notes - as a fact, they're actually more consistent than earlier value papers. 'Netherlands Bank', is in exactly the same position, in the same typography, are set in the exactly same way. The white circle holding an animal is in the same place on the both; and its foil stamps positioned the same on each. Even the UPC codes on the backs are in the same place.

CONTRASTS

Although the design is visually highly complex, but its information is ordered and rational. The hierarchy, in particular, is very clear; critical numbers and words are centered, and sized according to the importance.

HIERARCHY

The hierarchy has been set with the users in mind; the denomination, '10' is the most prominent followed by the currency name, 'Gulden', followed by the name of country, 'Nederlandsche'.
Color and detail have also been carefully organized to underscore the hierarchy. On the 10, white is used for the top level, the background is in blue, and all the directional elements stand out crisply in red with orange. As you go down in the hierarchy the detail gets richer and richer: the white numerals are plain, the red shapes have some linear detail and the blue backgrounds are incredibly detailed, that helps to the main information to come forward. In terms of sheer functionality, this design blows American currency away. For one thing, they've done a really good job of distinguishing the denominations clearly. First, all nos. are the largest element in the design hierarchy, and they're positioned at the top of the bills. Secondly, the size of the bill varies from every denomination to denomination, so you can feel the difference when you hold them. Third, they are so radically different in color, unlike ours, that you can't mistaken one bill for another. As for security, the print production is so complex, it's hard to imagine producing this design to begin with, much less counterfeiting it. The American paper may be specifically formulated, still every Dutch paper is almost three - dimensional, with the dense watermarks in a translucent body. It also holds such an insanely fine line in both inks and embossure, that lets them build an intricate texture: small, microscopic lines create a chevron pattern on the horizontal bars.

USER FRIENDLY

Beyond this, they've used multiple custom materials such as prismatic foil you probably can't buy anywhere. The most likable part of the design is what would be called as, 'the illusion of the content', as it looks like a scientific diagram. However, with the seriousness of the content, comes the Rembrandt factor into play. Having said all of this, the Dutch have exceled the perception of dirty money.

THE FAZE

A PICTORIAL NARRATIVE
BOOK DESIGN

The Faze is a collective celebration of ideas, images and innovation and a catalyst- for personal expression. The concept belied in capturing the restlessness of the creative flux within the inside and the outside world. A lot of layering of photographs, use of esoteric colors have been used to feature the framework aptly for this project. The flow of typography with its partial hide/show effect further justified the theme of the book. The images, objects and script that fall in various categories, have been shaped and modeled together by this interweaving experience of within and without onself.
